A Cigar Box, a Blade and Presto, a Radio

Take some cigar boxes, wire milk bottles, protractors, spoons, and razor blades and what do you have?

If you happen to be in Ralph Holt's sixth grade class at Jefferson Elementary School, you may well have a radio, a telephone, a barometer, or an expansion tester. All of these are projects in science carried on by the students.

Youngsters are building all sorts of interesting projects out of odds and ends. A primitive telephone has been created out of two cigar boxes, wire, razor blades, and an old pair of earphones. Radios are made of cigar boxes and razor blades and wires, plus an antenna strung to the roof.

A barometer was made out of a milk bottle, some wood, a rod, and discarded protractor. Before their eyes, children can watch the expansion of metal when a match is put to it, and the children even have figured out a gauge to test expansion.
